Farm Dairying.

Milk farming, or, in other words, the product from the cows, will pay the average farmer—located near large towns or cities—a far greater return for labor and capital invested than will any of the usual grain crops to which his lands are commonly devoted. And even in more remote districts, where the sale of milk and cream to the consumer direct is not practicable, the farmer of mixed husbandry who omits the important branch of dairying in connection with his businers, is running it at a loss and is not reaping the benefit of all the possibilities within his reach.

Modern appliances for managing the milk and cream and its manufacture into butter have reduced the old time drudgery of dairy work to the mini-mum, and by the observance of proper care and skill, a good tellar or dai-ry room adapted to the purposes in-tended, and a creamer, good butter can be made and paying prices can be obtained for it in every section of the country. There is never an over-supply of first class butter in any community, and it is always in demand, and once the dairyman establishes the reputation of furnishing uniformly an article of this kind and he is master of A fee bill in case of City of Baxter Springs vs. Nick Miller ($42.75) was referred to finance committee.

The milk supply, under proper management, is continuous throughout the year and the demand for it in the various forms in which it is possible to manipulate it, is active and fully as lasting as the supply.

During most of the year that part of the farm devoted to grass furnishes support for the cows without any additional expense, and the hay crop, the corn and fodder, can find no market that will make as good profits as when ter months to well selected, first class the chair and Koontz and Gardner turns, year after year, and no well-present. A favorable year of full crops affords but little relief, as the over-supply of these products of the soil force prices

A dairy of ten or more cows will return a net income varying from $50 to $100 each annually with a tolerable degree of certainty, depending, of course, very much upon location, the suitability of the cows for the work required of them, the manner in which they are fed and treated and quantity and kind of food furnished. If the business of butter making is adopted a breed of butter cows must be selected; if milk in large quantities is desired or cheese making the object breeds adapted for these purposes must be used or disappointment will follow. The best cows of the best breeds, most generously fed with suitable food, will always make the best returns, and no cow of any breed should be kept that does not pay a good margin over the cost of her keep.

It is not a necessity that the breed should be pure in blood—this would out many farmers of limited means, for, as a rule, thoroughbred cows are too high for ordinary use in the farm dairy-grades of the different milking races are obtainable in most sections at a little above and sometimes as low as the common stock of the country, and are much better and more reliable than natives, but the farmer whose aim is milk should confine his selection to stock bred for that purpose, without regard to beef values, if failures in the object sought should follow-the beef habit and milk giving properties are incompatible in the same animal-for highest results; in either direction special breeding and special feeding is demanded.

The general purpose cow has gone out of fashion since the breeder's skill has so fully demonstrated the superi-21. Able to speak English; if not, ority of special breeds for special work.

Animals of all the milk breeds are numerous that are capable of this performance with ease and cortainty.
